Royal Mothers

This Queen of England had 17 children—only one of whom survived infancy. The one survivor, William, tragically died at the age of eleven, leaving her heirless within her dynasty.

The fall of many European monarchies in the early twentieth centuries left a lot of royals abandoned without a country or a throne:

This last empress of Austria died in 1989, 71 years after her husband was forced to depart the throne at the end of World War I

This former Queen of Spain died in 1969, 38 years after her husband's abdication—and 6 years before her grandson was to become King Juan Carlos I:

This last Empress of India died 55 years after losing her throne and 50 years after the death of her mother:

This last Queen of Albania married King Zog in 1938—only to see him forcibly deposed by the Italians the next year. She spent the next 64 years in exile, returning to Albania in 2002 only four months before her death.

...and non-Mothers.

This princess was betrothed to Otto III of Germany—but he died before they were married. She remained unmarried until she became Empress of Byzantium. She did her best job trying to become a mother (and fulfill her dynastic ambitions)—marrying a grand total of four times. However, as all her marriages were conducted after the age of fifty, this was to little avail:

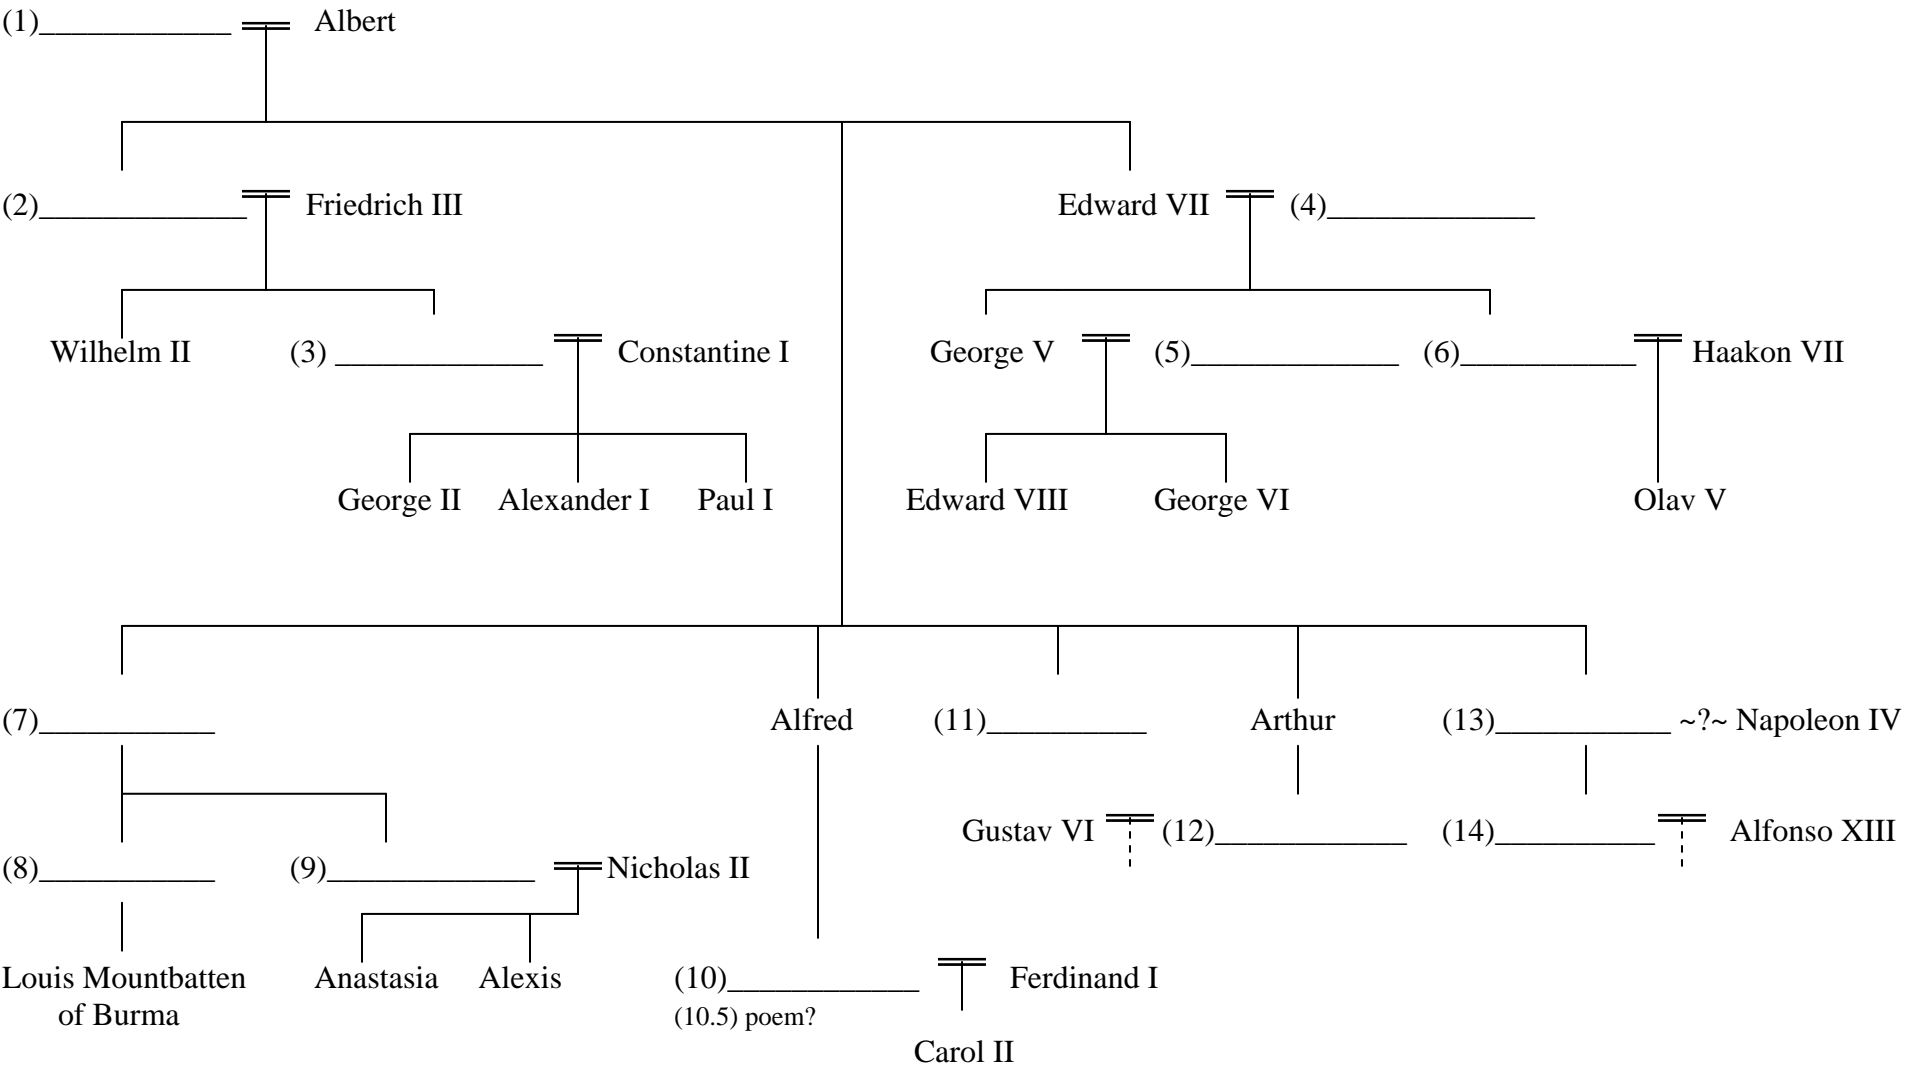

This queen never had any children of her own—despite her husband, Charles II, having 13 children by his mistresses.
