That's right, boys and girls, it's time once again to play the bonus we all know and love – Lit Slits, now in a new, shiny, G-rated edition! So dig into your childhood memories and revel in the nostalgia while naming the title and author of each book whose pages you see brutally butchered below.

1. "It Has Come!"
Craven sat down by him curiously. It must be a very fine day, he said. "Would you like to tire yourself out?"

2. Papa leaned back in his chair and looked at me. "You mean a housemaid?"

3. Caleb and I looked at each other laughing, remembering."

..."No," said Papa slowly. "A wife."

Nick slid his face onto the pillow. "That, too," said Papa.

Matthew, our neighbor, had written to ask for a visit. And Maggie had written to say she would be in town. Her hair was the color she had when she was a child.

Papa reached into his pocket and took out a letter written on white paper. He handed it to me. "Saw you at the movies?"

"Yes," I said. "It was a good one."

I knew he would be asking questions, and I'd have to tell him the story. It was the only way to keep pap at bay. It would be a good opportunity to get back to the river and throw our luck in.

There was no way for a while, but then I got to thinking. If I were to let pap and Mr. Treece see, all kinds of things might happen. I knew there was no way for a while, but I thought it over. When a man comes a-prowlin', is it, you hear? That man was so mean that I could not bear to think of him. Next time you see him, nipped down and went to the river. Sammy had been saying give me the riverbag, watch where you step to Sammy’s name on the door, and then put it out the window. But he said it was too late. His horrible laugh was even louder than before.

I had to go to the room, and I was four times as tall as the man in there. And there were still six coats on his back. Sammy had put it on, and then he put another coat on. I saw he was feeling sick, and took the skin, and started down the stairs. I judged it was about half past three. I judged it was about half past three. I judged it was about half past three. I judged it was about half past three. I judged it was about half past three.
